Bernd & Hilla Becher, Robert Smithson: Field Trips. hopefulmonster editore, 2002. 172pp. £28. It is perhaps not everyone's idea of a fun day out, but in December 1968 the Bechers and Robert Smithson - in different ways, surely among the most influential artists of the past quarter-century - took a trip to Oberhausen, then one of the Ruhr's most dense industrial sites.

Bernd & Hilla Becher, Robert Smithson: Field Trips

On the background of these two approaches, I will read the art works of Gordon-Matta Clark, Robert Smithson and Bernd and Hilla Bechers as giving voice to all that is forgotten, excluded or unacknowledged in architecture. The importance of these artists lies in their exploration of negativityin architecture.

Bernd and Hilla Becher's work aspires toward objective documentation, aiming for images without subjectivity. Their photographs reacted against the prevailing mid-20 th-century trend toward images in which the subject of a photograph is transformed by artistic elements such as soft focus, atmospheric lighting, or creative perspective. The Bechers photographed all structures in the same way, from a direct angle with a low horizon against a grey sky that minimized shadows, cropping each image ...
